Human Rights

and their Possible Universality

February 16th–18th, 2009, Oslo, Norway

19th Conference of the Academy of Latinity

19th International Conference

The Oslo Conference is meant to be at the center of the new dialectics posed by a “civilization of fear,” of its inevitable advent, in pursuit of possible levels of international understanding, able to simultaneously escape the contemporary fundamentalism and the vague universalisms where finally vanishes the idea of a dialogue fostered by ideologies and beliefs in the future of a single world. In the course of the last conferences, the notion of human rights has become the kingpin for updating a possible face to face rallying of our time, on these values of our collective “in itself” [en soi] able of making sure the historical claim for a coexistence in diversity. Such rights, apantage of the western consciousness, are confronted nowadays with the deadlock of a reason reified in all the alibis of the progress. This deadlock of the reason claims for the critical instance of interculturalism as well as the discussion of this specific terrorism of our time, appeared with the September 11. A true revival of the dialectics of recognition of collective subjectivities takes us into the play of genuine “reciprocities of perspective;” reproduction and pretense, amalgamated with the mimesis of authenticity.

This is what simultaneously impels us towards the acceleration of the perplexities of a world of identity irrationalness. Wars of religion are in waiting, just as the Western domination turns to hegemony. To what extent, within the emerging universe of fundamentalisms, can one still find a truce, in search for a “praxis” strengthened by the testimony, by the replacement of the imaginary, or with the self-consciousness victimized by its mimesis, the alterity, with the abandonment of the humanisms in favor of its absolutes, in order to escape the civilizatory pledges? And to what extent the human rights still remain the sign and seal of the last campaign to make of our time the adventure of freedom; or the breakaway from the difference, towards the circuits without return of the simulacra?
